

No. 20–1088

IN THE
Supreme Court of the United States

CARSON ET AL.,
Petitioners,

v.

A. PENDER MAKIN, in her official capacity as Commissioner of the Maine Department of Education, Respondent.

On Petition for Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit

BRIEF FOR AMICI CURIAE
AMERICANS FOR PROSPERITY FOUNDATION AND
YES. EVERY KID.
IN SUPPORT OF PETITIONERS

CYNTHIA FLEMING CRAWFORD
Counsel of Record

CASEY MATTOX

AMERICANS FOR PROSPERITY
FOUNDATION

1310 N. Courthouse Road, Ste. 700

Arlington, VA 22201

(571) 329-2227

ccrawford@afphq.org

Counsel for Amici Curiae

March 9, 2021

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Interest of Amici Curiae.....1
Summary of Argument.....2
Argument.....6
I. Facial Discrimination Against Matters of Conscience Protected by the First Amendment
Merits Strict Scrutiny.....6
A. The Level of Scrutiny Applicable to Free Exercise Claims is a Mystery this Court Must Solve.....8
B. Free Speech Enjoys a Level of Scrutiny that is not Afforded to Free Exercise.11
1. In Speech Cases, the Burden is on the Government and Tailoring Must be Narrow. ...12
2. The First Amendment Does Not Require
Guilty Intent.....14
C. The Level of Scrutiny Should Not Vary Based on Viewpoint.....15
1. Because the Viewpoint of the Student Can Never Really Be Known, Assignment of Level of Scrutiny Based on Religious Use is Arbitrary. .15
2. Using Objective Criteria to Evaluate Education Would Eliminate Arbitrary
Application of the Law.....16
3. Equal Enjoyment of Civil Benefits Should Not Turn on Government Cognizance of Religious Viewpoint.18

II. Diminishing the Level of Scrutiny in Religious Use Cases Places Children Seeking Non- Discriminatory Education at an Immediate Disadvantage.	19
Conclusion	23

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

	Page(s)
Cases
Anderson v. Town of Durham , 895 A.2d 944 (Me. 2006)	passim
Brown v. Board of Education , 347 U.S. 483 (1954)	22
Brown v. Entm't Merch. Ass'n , 564 U.S. 786 (2011)	13
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah , 508 U.S. 520 (1993)	9, 10
City of Ladue v. Gilleo , 512 U.S. 43 (1994)	13
Colorado Christian University v. Weaver , 534 F.3d 1245 (10th Cir. 2008)	10, 11
Denver Area Educ. Telecomms. Consortium, Inc. v. FCC , 518 U.S. 727 (1996)	12
Emp't Div., Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith , 494 U.S. 872 (1990)	7, 9, 10
Eulitt ex rel. Eulitt v. Me, Dep't of Educ. , 386 F.3d 344 (1st Cir. 2004)	22

Keyishian v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. of State of N. Y. , 385 U.S. 589 (1967).....	7
Locke v. Davey , 540 U.S. 712 (2004).....	5, 11, 22
McDaniel v. Paty , 435 U.S. 618 (1978).....	9, 10, 19
Nat'l Inst. of Family & Life Advocates v. Becerra , 138 S. Ct. 2361 (2018).....	12
Prince v. Massachusetts , 321 U.S. 158 (1944).....	6, 7
Reed v. Town of Gilbert , 135 S. Ct. 2218 (2015).....	12, 14
Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of Univ. of Virginia , 515 U.S. 819 (1995).....	12
Thornhill v. Alabama , 310 U.S. 88 (1940).....	7
Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer , 137 S. Ct. 2012 (2017).....	4, 6, 8, 10
United States v. Sineneng-Smith , 140 S. Ct. 1575 (2020).....	7

ConstitutionsU.S. Const. Amend. I..... passim

U.S. Const. Amend. XIV.....2

Statutes

Me. Rev. Stat. tit. 20, §1902..... 17

Me. Rev. Stat. tit. 20, §2901..... 17

Rules

Supreme Court Rule 37.2..... 1

Other Authorities

Brief of Black Alliance for Educational Options, Hispanic Council for Reform and Educational Options, Excellent Education for Everyone, Center for Education Reform and Reason
Foundation as Amici Curiae in Support of Appellants, Bush v. Holmes,
919 So.2d 392 (Fla. 2006) 2004 WL
3202636 20

Catholic School FACT Sheet,
<https://www.usccb.org/beliefs-and-teachings/how-we-teach/catholic-education/upload/Catholic-Schools-FACT-Sheet-2016.pdf> 20

Martin R West, Schools of Choice
Expanding opportunity for urban minority students, Education Next,
(Spring 2016).....20

New England Association of Schools and Colleges Standards for Independent School Accreditation,
<https://cis.neasc.org/standards2020>17

William Sander, The Effects of Catholic Schools on Religiosity, Education, and Competition, National Center for the Study of Privatization in Education
Teachers College, Columbia University
(August 2001).....20

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE
AMERICANS FOR PROSPERITY FOUNDATION AND
YES. EVERY KID.
IN SUPPORT OF PETITIONERS

Pursuant to Supreme Court Rule 37.2, Americans for Prosperity Foundation (“AFPF”) and yes. every kid. respectfully submit this amici curiae brief in support of Petitioners.¹ Amici are both part of the Stand Together community.

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

Amicus curiae AFPF is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization committed to educating and training Americans to be courageous advocates for the ideas, principles, and policies of a free and open society. As part of this mission, it appears as amicus curiae before federal and state courts.

AFPF is committed to ensuring the freedom of expression and association guaranteed by the First Amendment, particularly where the economic opportunity and well-being of children is dependent on a robust and diverse society.

Amicus curiae yes. every kid. believes the purpose of education is to help all students discover, develop and apply their unique abilities, establishing a foundation for a life of fulfillment and success. yes. every kid. supports education policy that respects the dignity of every student, fosters a diversity of approaches, and is open to the free flow of ideas and innovation.

¹ All parties have consented to the filing of this brief after receiving timely notice. Amici state that no counsel for a party authored this brief in whole or in part and that no person other than amici or its counsel made any monetary contributions to fund the preparation or submission of this brief.

Amici have a particular interest in this case because they are national organizations dedicated to ensuring families have every available educational option to choose for their children. That includes the freedom to choose the education that best fits a student's needs, whether it is a public school, private school, charter school, or homeschool.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

If a speaker is silenced by the government based on viewpoint, strict scrutiny applies under the Free Speech clause. If a child is deprived of education based on race, then strict scrutiny applies under the Fourteenth Amendment. In both cases, the government bears the initial burden of justifying the infringement and in neither must the victim's conscience be probed to establish the Constitution's protection.

Why then, can some speakers who open the door to equal opportunity for school children be silenced unless they prove sincerity? Why can a child be excluded from educational opportunity—even when exclusion falls harder on some races than others—without first exposing her conscience to state examination and valuation? Why are a child's due process and equal protection claims less important when rooted in religious belief than other First Amendment matters of conscience?

Maine courts diminish the constitutional rights of students and those who would help them receive an education by first applying the reduced standard reserved for religious practice and then ratcheting down related constitutional claims to rational basis scrutiny. By inserting a layer of religion and subjecting the free exercise claim to shifting standards and arbitrary distinctions, alternative legal theories are cut off.

In Maine, a child who wants to use her tuition assistance to attend a religious school will be precluded by the express terms of the Maine statute. One might expect such a law, which discriminates on its face against a First Amendment right, would be subject to strict scrutiny. But unlike other constitutional protections, the scarlet label “sectarian” places the burden on the child to explain why the discrimination was unjustified. As the Supreme Court of Maine has explained: “The party challenging a statute on free exercise grounds must initially demonstrate that: (1) the activity burdened by the regulation is motivated by a sincerely held religious belief; and (2) the challenged regulation restrains the free exercise of that religious belief.” Anderson v. Town of Durham, 895 A.2d 944, 952 (Me. 2006) (citation omitted). Placing the initial burden on the victim distinguishes free exercise from other constitutional protections and leaves the child at an immediate—and predictably insurmountable—disadvantage.

Allocation of the burden is only the beginning. The nature of the burden—which can only be satisfied by exposing the most personal beliefs of the child and the wished-for school to searching inquiry and valuation by the government—differentiates this burden from other constitutional claims for which infringement is enough. Speakers are not required to prove earnestness to overcome government censorship.

News organizations do not have to demonstrate sincerity before publishing an article. Protesters do not have to establish deeply-held beliefs before protesting. And children need not establish a heartfelt desire to attend a particular school before exclusion based on race is suspect. None of these must prove their deeply held beliefs are implicated before courts require the government to justify discrimination.

But religious exclusions from education are not only constitutionally anomalous because the student bears the burden, but because the applicable level of scrutiny is only determined after the dispositive issue has been decided. The First Circuit, relying on Espinoza and Trinity Lutheran, stated that discrimination that is solely status-based is subject to strict-scrutiny; but since the Maine statute, in that court's view, applies to religious use—a proxy for the school's religious viewpoint²—strict scrutiny did not apply. If so, what level of scrutiny does apply? The Court of Appeals did not say, identifying no alternative level of scrutiny applicable to use-based restrictions—not even applying rational basis review. Because status-based discrimination faces strict scrutiny, and use-based discrimination, at least here, is subject to no scrutiny, the outcome of the use/status test was dispositive.

And perhaps more significantly, the Court of Appeals identified no standard applicable to the State's purportedly fact-based designation³ of schools as unacceptably sectarian or acceptably secular in the first place. The result of that test, from which all other results flow, was simply accepted at face value. Had any standard been applied to this designation, the State would have had to explain how attendance at an accredited school that satisfies Maine's compulsory education laws could fail to provide equivalent education to public schools.⁴ It would also have to explain how, if the amount of compensation to private schools is pegged to the cost of public schooling, those funds would have been funneled into religious use à la Locke v. Davey, without the schools providing all mandatory education for free. This contention would struggle to satisfy any level of scrutiny, had any level of scrutiny been applied.

² See App. 43–44 (distinguishing public school education taught from a secular perspective from private education taught from a religious perspective).

³ See App. 58 (“the determination of whether a school is secular could readily be made by looking at objective factors:”).

Applying the use/status test before deciding which level of scrutiny applies, closes the circle that began with burden allocation to foreclose any outcome but the one allowing exclusion based on religion. The process is akin to judging the viewpoint of a speaker before determining whether strict scrutiny applies. But, like free speech, the protections of the Free Exercise Clause should not depend on first evaluating viewpoint. Whether the choir master believes that "singing is praying twice" or simply good training for a career on Broadway should not dictate the legal standard applicable to deprivation of a public benefit on the basis of religion.

The questions presented here are important because the rights protected by the First Amendment are interdependent and cannot be robustly defended in isolation. A jurisprudential divergence in the treatment of free speech cases from free exercise cases has resulted in greater protection for expression of an idea than for the belief from which that expression arose—if that belief is religious. Hence, this case, in which the State of Maine has excluded children who have no public school available to them from using Maine’s tuition assistance program to satisfy the State’s compulsory education requirement at the accredited school of their choice, if their preferred school is deemed to teach from a religious perspective.

⁴ The Court of Appeals accepted that secular education is different from religious education. App.43–44. But that is simply begging the question.

This case also highlights the lack of consistent standards among free exercise cases and the persistent divergence between the strict scrutiny applied as a matter of course to free speech and the lesser, and messier, standards applied to free exercise. In education, both labels turn on viewpoint, which is beyond the ken of government. Where, as here, the education satisfies the obligation imposed by the state, that is where the state’s inquiry should stop.

The Court should close the loophole it left open in Trinity Lutheran and clarify that perspective-based tests have no more place in free exercise cases than they have in speech cases. Under either clause, strict scrutiny should apply.

ARGUMENT

I. FACIAL DISCRIMINATION AGAINST MATTERS OF CONSCIENCE PROTECTED BY THE FIRST AMENDMENT MERITS STRICT SCRUTINY.

The First Amendment is a single sentence that does not establish a hierarchy among its clauses. This Court has noted that “it may be doubted that any of the great liberties insured by the First Article can be given higher place than the others. All have preferred position in our basic scheme.” Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944). Yet jurisprudence has diverged so the standard applied to infringement of speech varies dramatically from the standard applied to that for free exercise of religion, with speech more easily vindicated. Adding additional complexity, the standard applied to free exercise is inconsistent. To the extent the breach should be healed, it is this Court’s province to do so.

Justice Thomas highlighted the unexplained discrepancy in the treatment of the clauses in his concurrence in United States v. Sineneng-Smith.⁵ Indeed, the Speech Clause may be pressed into service where another provision would be a more comfortable fit because the level of scrutiny applied to speech is more attractive to litigants. This unexplained dichotomy contributes to arbitrary treatment based on viewpoint simply by framing the issue as a matter of speech rather than a matter of religion.

⁵ “Such arguments are typically raised in free speech cases, but the Court has occasionally entertained overbreadth challenges invoking the freedom of the press, see, e.g., Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 60 S.Ct. 736, 84 L.Ed. 1093 (1940), and the freedom of association, see, e.g., Keyishian v. Board of Regents of Univ. of State of N. Y., 385 U.S. 589, 87 S.Ct. 675, 17 L.Ed.2d 629 (1967). Curiously, however, the Court has never applied this doctrine in the context of the First Amendment’s Religion Clauses. In fact, the Court currently applies a far less protective standard to free exercise claims, upholding laws that substantially burden religious exercise so long as they are neutral and generally applicable. See Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 108 L.Ed.2d 876 (1990). The Court has never acknowledged, much less explained, this discrepancy.” United States v. Sineneng-Smith, 140 S. Ct. 1575, 1584 (2020) (Thomas, J. concurring).

Justice Gorsuch, concurring in Trinity Lutheran, also highlighted the arbitrary divisions within free exercise review, pondering whether the “First Amendment’s Free Exercise Clause should care” about a distinction between “laws that discriminate on the basis of religious status and religious use.” Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, 137 S. Ct. 2012, 2025 (2017) (Gorsuch, J. concurring). “After all, that Clause guarantees the free exercise of religion, not just the right to inward belief (or status).” Id. Taken together, seemingly arbitrary differences inject substantial uncertainty and unequal treatment into freedoms that are facially equal under the First Amendment.

A. The Level of Scrutiny Applicable to Free Exercise Claims is a Mystery this Court Must Solve.

Framing the question as a simple difference between religious use and status gives a patina of coherence to free exercise cases and provides an excellent vehicle for the Court to clarify the law. But the disarray in standards applied to free exercise claims is not as easily catalogued as it may appear, with varying standards resulting in lopsided treatment for claims that are closely analogous.

Two prominent cases appear to stand for the proposition that non-neutral burdens on religious exercise must satisfy strict scrutiny regardless of whether they target activity or status. But the use of these cases in Trinity Lutheran shows how the slender distinction between activity and status can be pressed into contrary service when convenient.

In Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, the ordinances in question were described as having two salient characteristics:⁶ (1) their texts and operation demonstrated that they had “as their object the suppression of Santeria’s central element, animal sacrifice” and thus prohibited “sacrificial practice” and “religious conduct”; and (2) “the ordinances pursue[d] the city’s governmental interests only against conduct motivated by religious belief.” 508 U.S. 520, 521 (1993). These characteristics related to religious activity. They did not have anything to say about the status of the Church as a church. Likewise, the prohibitions distinguished between ritual animal sacrifice versus non-religious animal slaughter, a distinction based in activity. Lukumi is a religious use case, focusing on activity alone.

By contrast, the “Tennessee statute barring ‘[m]inister[s] of the Gospel, or priest[s] of any denomination whatever’ from serving as delegates to the State’s limited constitutional convention,” in McDaniel v. Paty, was status-based on its face. 435 U.S. 618, 620 (1978). But even this clear statement of status was subject to the caveat that “such authority as is available indicates that ministerial status is defined in terms of conduct and activity rather than in terms of belief.” Id. at 627–28. Thus, even an express status-based exception was rooted in activity, showing that the distinction between activity and status is really no difference at all.

Taken together, these cases cover the field of religious exercise: identity and activity, with Lukumi

⁶ Lukumi was decided under the “neutral and of general applicability” standard of Smith, 494 U.S. 872, which is not pertinent here as the Maine statute is discriminatory on its face.

subjecting restrictions on religious activity to strict scrutiny, 508 U.S. at 546, and McDaniel subjecting status-based restrictions to “close” or “careful” scrutiny.⁷ 435 U.S. at 644–45.

And yet, Trinity Lutheran cites Lukumi for the proposition that the “Free Exercise Clause . . . subjects to the strictest scrutiny laws that target . . . ‘religious status.’” 137 S. Ct. at 2019. If a case based solely on targeted religious activity falls on the status side of the use/status test, then what hope could there be for non-arbitrary application of strict scrutiny to “status” cases and not to “use” cases? The use/status test further muddles laws that are unclear, or that, as here, have clear text but are applied using an extra-textual classification.

Although predating Trinity Lutheran by a decade, Colorado Christian University v. Weaver identified the challenge courts face in selecting which level of scrutiny to apply. 534 F.3d 1245 (10th Cir. 2008). Like this case, the Colorado scholarship program in Colorado Christian provided money to students based on the viewpoint of the school, allowing scholarships to students “who attend sectarian—but not ‘pervasively’ sectarian—universities.” Id. at 1258. The Tenth Circuit held that under Smith “[t]his is discrimination ‘on the basis of religious views or religious status,’ . . . and is subject to heightened constitutional scrutiny.” Id. But what is the ⁷ McDaniel does not explain how these terms differ from strict scrutiny. It does require state interest of “the highest order” but does not require any element analogous to narrow tailoring. Thus “close scrutiny” is apparently a less exacting standard on at least one dimension.

“heightened scrutiny” the court sought to apply? Even it was unsure, stating:

As already discussed, Locke v. Davey introduces some uncertainty about the level of scrutiny applicable to discriminatory funding. The majority opinion refrained from stating what level of scrutiny it was applying to Joshua Davey’s First Amendment claim, but dropped two hints that the proper level of scrutiny may be something less than strict. . . . While considerably more demanding than rational basis, this likely falls short of requiring that the government’s interest be “compelling.”

Id. at 1267 citing Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004). In the end, the Colorado Christian court declined to decide “precisely what level of scrutiny applies” because “on any plausible level of scrutiny, the discriminatory nature of the exclusion provisions cannot be justified.” Id. at 1267, 1269. While punting was an option for the Tenth Circuit due to the egregious facts of the case, even more egregious facts here were not enough for the courts below to find infringement. This Court should resolve the issue and provide clarity for the courts below.

B. Free Speech Enjoys a Level of Scrutiny that is not Afforded to Free Exercise.

Two key inquiries—burden and tailoring—may be dispositive in a case that could be decided on either free speech or free exercise grounds. Here, exclusion based on religious perspective fails both inquiries.

1. In Speech Cases, the Burden is on the Government and Tailoring Must be Narrow.

If this case were evaluated under the free-speech rubric, the burden would fall squarely on the government to rebut the presumption that the infringement is unconstitutional. That is because “[d]iscrimination against speech [due to] its message is presumed to be unconstitutional.” Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of Univ. of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 828–29 (1995). That the burden must be borne by the government would be pellucid given the viewpoint-specific nature of the infringement. “When the government targets . . . particular views taken by speakers on a subject, the violation of the First Amendment is all the more blatant.” Id.

Moreover, the Court has resisted attempts to expand exclusions from free speech protection. See, e.g., Denver Area Educ. Telecomms. Consortium, Inc. v. FCC, 518 U.S. 727, 804 (1996) (The Court has “been reluctant to mark off new categories of speech for diminished constitutional protection.”); Nat’l Inst. of Family & Life Advocates v. Becerra, 138 S. Ct. 2361, 2371–72 (2018) (“Speech is not unprotected merely because it is uttered by ‘professionals.’”). These standards reflect the principle that governments have “no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content.” Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 135 S. Ct. 2218, 2226 (2015) (citation omitted). There is no reason to believe excluding religious schools from a generally available program based on the viewpoint from which they teach would fall into a known exclusion.

To carry its burden under the Free Speech rubric, the government would have to demonstrate that the infringement passes strict scrutiny—that it “is justified by a compelling government interest and is narrowly drawn to serve that interest.” Brown v. Entm’t Merch. Ass’n, 564 U.S. 786, 799 (2011). This means the “State must specifically identify an actual problem in need of solving, . . . and the curtailment of free speech must be actually necessary to the solution.” Id. (citations omitted). To be narrowly drawn, a restriction may not be overinclusive, prohibiting too much speech, or underinclusive, restricting too little speech to meet its goal. City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43, 50–51 (1994). “Underinclusiveness raises serious doubts about whether the government is . . . pursuing the interest it invokes, rather than disfavoring a particular speaker or viewpoint.” Entm’t Merch. Ass’n, 564 U.S. at 802.

Here, Maine had a long tradition of administering the tuition assistance program by allowing religious schools to participate. See Anderson, 895 A.2d at 948. The State identified no “actual problem in need of solving” that would explain its change in policy in the 1980s. Instead, that change was based on an erroneous legal opinion and the rationale provided in that opinion has since been abandoned. Id. at 948–49.

The current approach also fails to be narrowly drawn, being overinclusive in excluding secular activities, such as teaching languages, math, physical education, science classes, etc. that are presented in a religious setting and underinclusive in making no attempt to exclude funding to public schools for children who seek education for a religious purpose. App. 44. These are burdens the State must bear but could not carry here.

2. The First Amendment Does Not Require Guilty Intent.

Instead of placing the burden on the State to justify the infringement, the First Circuit bypassed the burden analysis and swept aside the unequal treatment of sectarian schools because Maine “betrays no hostility toward religion when it imposes a use-based ‘nonsectarian’ restriction on the public funds that it makes available for the purpose of providing a substitute for the public educational instruction that is not otherwise offered.” App. 46–47.

Requiring the government to betray a culpable state of mind has no corollary in other First Amendment jurisprudence. Indeed, this Court has made clear that illicit intent “is not the sine qua non of a violation of the First Amendment.” Reed, 135 S. Ct. at 2228. In cases of viewpoint suppression, the government must justify the infringement. At no time is the victim required to prove the government had guilty intent. Here, the First Circuit relieved the State of that burden.

The gap between a presumption of invalidity in cases of speech infringement and requiring proof of hostility in cases of religious infringement is vast—and an open invitation to rely on the Speech Clause in lieu of the Free Exercise Clause. This is not only unsupported by the text and history of the First Amendment but does damage to the full protection of all of First Amendment freedoms by placing pressure on some clauses to resolve cases that may be resolved more naturally under others.

C. The Level of Scrutiny Should Not Vary Based on Viewpoint.

“Mathematics is the language in which God has written the universe.”

— Galileo Galilei

“The science of pure mathematics, in its modern developments, may claim to be the most original creation of the human spirit.”

— Alfred North Whitehead

God or human—who is the author of mathematics? As a philosophical matter, this question may be fodder for late-night dorm room debates, but it has no place in assessing whether an algebra class passes academic muster. And, if a child were lucky enough to have Galileo Galilei or Alfred North Whitehead as a math teacher, the legal status of the lesson should not turn on first asking whether the teacher believes math to be the work of God or of the human spirit.

But that is what the First Circuit has done here, asking first: “Who speaks and what do they believe?” before asking whether the educational service meets the objective standard set forth in the law.

1. Because the Viewpoint of the Student Can Never Really Be Known, Assignment of Level of Scrutiny Based on Religious Use is Arbitrary.

Imagine two high school students. The first attends public school and is studying French in preparation for a post-high school religious mission abroad. The second, who is agnostic, is studying Italian at a private religious school in preparation for a career as a United Nations interpreter because Italian is not available at the public school. The conspicuous question is: which of these academic pursuits is a religious use? Less obvious but perhaps more troubling is: How would you know?

The motivation of the student, whether in preparation for a religious mission or a career at the United Nations, is information the state simply does not have. Nor could it get this information in any prudent and accurate way. Any attempt would be intrusive, speculative, and prone to bias; and the output of any such attempt would become increasingly inaccurate with each passing day. Sorting and labeling students in this manner would offend the Constitution on multiple levels as well as pitting the state and students against each other for no purpose but to deprive certain students of benefits.

The State of Maine attempts to resolve this quandary by employing attendance at religious school as a proxy for religious use. But it is a fallacy to assume that studying at a religious school is a religious use for the student—regardless of the perspective of the school, just as it is a fallacy to assume that studying in public school is a secular use. As a basis for differential legal treatment, it is arbitrary and defies equal protection.

2. Using Objective Criteria to Evaluate Education Would Eliminate Arbitrary Application of the Law.

There is a ready alternative to governmental mind-reading: using objective public measures to evaluate the legal sufficiency of the services provided.

Maine, for example, has promulgated criteria for private schools to satisfy Maine's compulsory education laws:

Requirement for basic school approval

A private school may operate as an approved private school for meeting the requirement of compulsory school attendance under section 5001-A if it:

1. Hygiene, health, safety. Meets the standards for hygiene, health and safety established by applicable law and rule; and

2. Is either:

A. Currently accredited by a New England association of schools and colleges; or

B. Meets applicable requirements of this Title pertaining to private schools and the department's requirements for approval for attendance purposes adopted under section 2902.

Me. Rev. Stat. tit. 20, §2901.⁸

⁸ See also Anderson, 895 A.2d at 948 (“School approval criteria include either accreditation by the New England Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools, or compliance with State requirements including basic instruction in designated curriculum, certification of teachers, length of school day, and student-teacher ratios.”); New England Association of Schools and Colleges Standards for Independent School Accreditation, available at <https://cis.neasc.org/standards2020> (last accessed February 24, 2021); Me. Rev. Stat. tit. 20, §1902 (setting forth

These objective and measurable requirements are available on the State’s website,⁹ are generally applicable, and have already been determined to satisfy the State’s interest in the child’s education. No arbitrary sorting of students or teachers—or mindreading—is required.

3. Equal Enjoyment of Civil Benefits Should Not Turn on Government Cognizance of Religious Viewpoint.

Arbitrary application of legal standards to exclude equal access to civil benefits on the basis of religion could be avoided if the government humbly took no cognizance of religious viewpoint when divvying up government benefits. The error of government presuming to dictate religious qualifications for equal participation in civil society drove the founders to divorce religious preference from government:

James Madison . . . vigorously urged the position which in our view accurately reflects the spirit and purpose of the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment. . . . ‘Does not The exclusion of Ministers of the Gospel as such violate a fundamental principle of liberty by punishing a religious profession with the privation of a civil right? does it [not] violate another article of the plan itself which exempts religion from the cognizance of Civil power? does it not state requirements for private schools approved for attendance purposes by the Department of Education).

⁹ <https://www.mainelegislature.org/legis/statutes/20-a/title20-Ach117sec0.html> (last accessed February 8, 2021).

violate justice by at once taking away a right and prohibiting a compensation for it? does it not in fine violate impartiality by shutting the door [against] the Ministers of one Religion and leaving it open for those of every other.’

McDaniel, 435 U.S. at 623 (quoting Writings of James Madison 288 (G. Hunt ed. 1904)). These questions apply equally to punishing a religious child with the privation of a civil right where the state would best honor the First Amendment by taking no cognizance of religion at all.

II. DIMINISHING THE LEVEL OF SCRUTINY IN RELIGIOUS USE CASES PLACES CHILDREN SEEKING NON-DISCRIMINATORY EDUCATION AT AN IMMEDIATE DISADVANTAGE.

Fundamental rights do not exist in isolation; undermining one can have unanticipated effects elsewhere—such as by precluding racial minorities from taking advantage of opportunities for educational success. This unintentional outcome flows from erecting barriers to religious schools, which in many jurisdictions are the best or only alternative to unsatisfactory public schools.

The benefits of religious schools to closing achievement gaps has been documented for decades. As early as 1979, a study performed for the Department of Education showed that “students in Catholic high schools both learned more and had higher graduation rates than their public-school peers. Minority students in particular appeared to benefit from the Catholic school experience.”¹⁰ Follow-on studies have shown analogous results,¹¹ with long term benefits such as increased high school graduation rates, increased college attendance rates, and increased participation in community service.¹² “For this reason, Catholic schools have favorable effects on equity.”^{13, 14}

¹⁰ Martin R West, Schools of Choice Expanding opportunity for urban minority students, Education Next, at 48 (Spring 2016) (citing James S. Coleman, High School and Beyond (1979)).

¹¹ Id. at 50 (“Thomas Hoffer in 1987, seemed to confirm Coleman's prior findings about Catholic schools' success in boosting the achievement of minority students. (Any test-score gains for white students were modest at best.) More important, the results showed that students in Catholic schools were far less likely to drop out of school before graduating, and these positive effects were again more pronounced for black and Hispanic students. Coleman and Hoffer showed that Catholic schools had stronger disciplinary standards than public schools and that their students were more likely to take advanced courses.”).

¹² Catholic School FACT Sheet, available at: <https://www.usccb.org/beliefs-and-teachings/how-we-teach/catholic-education/upload/Catholic-Schools-FACT-Sheet-2016.pdf>

¹³ William Sander, The Effects of Catholic Schools on Religiosity, Education, and Competition, National Center for the Study of Privatization in Education Teachers College, Columbia University (August 2001).

¹⁴ See also Brief of Black Alliance for Educational Options, Hispanic Council for Reform and Educational Options, Excellent Education for Everyone, Center for Education Reform and Reason Foundation as Amici Curiae in Support of Appellants, Bush v. Holmes, 919 So.2d 392 (Fla. 2006) (Nos. SC04-2323, SC04-2324, SC04-2325) 2004 WL 3202636 *17–19 (providing analysis and citations to studies showing that access to private schools improves racial integration, increases tolerance, and

Other non-protected, but still salient, characteristics such as socio-economic status may also be favorably implicated. Id. This should come as no surprise for schools that approach education as a ministry. But the government can block access to demonstrated benefits and escape scrutiny for directly damaging racial minorities, by simply muttering “religious use” to evade not just strict scrutiny, but any scrutiny at all. By using religion to block access to education with demonstrated benefits to racial equity and economic opportunity, the state creates an unnecessary tension between fundamental rights that could support each other if only the state would stay its hand. Achieving equity through education has already been lost for generations, how many more kids must lose their chance?

Moreover, government scrutiny of provider motivation sets up a perverse result for non-religious children who want to attend religious school to better their situation in life. If under a Free Exercise test that only recognizes burdens on deeply-held religious beliefs, only the “sincere” believer may pass the schoolhouse gate, the non-believer—who may most need access to that school for reasons only tangentially related to religion—is doomed.¹⁵ This is exactly what the First Amendment protects against: government determination of who shall be saved.

The process of applying a lesser standard to religious exercise claims and then using that improves other civic outcomes, such as volunteering and political participation).

¹⁵ Anderson, 895 A.2d at 959 (constitutionally significant burden on religion only for conditioning benefits on conduct “proscribed” by faith or punishing conduct “mandated” by faith).

application to ratchet down the level of scrutiny of related equal protection or due process claims is demonstrated in Anderson v. Town of Durham, where the Supreme Court of Maine, addressing the same tuition assistance exclusion at issue here, found no free exercise violation; and then, relying on Locke and Eulitt held that associated due process and equal protection claims need only satisfy rational basis scrutiny. 895 A.2d at 956, 959–60 citing Eulitt ex rel. Eulitt v. Me, Dep't of Educ., 386 F.3d 344, 355 (1st Cir. 2004). The religion clauses were never intended as a sword to cut off other constitutional provisions, such as equal protection.

Compare these real-world effects to the aspirational language of Brown v. Board of Education to provide education to “all on equal terms.” 347 U.S. 483, 493 (1954). As a matter of legal theory, there are differences between Brown and equal access to school funding. But from the perspective of the child, both reflect government action that closes off the best chance at success for some children. Heaping injury upon insult, not only is the child unequal in the eyes of the law based on religion, being excluded from neutral benefits by being labelled sectarian,¹⁶ but is also unable to successfully argue unequal treatment on other grounds by the lower level of scrutiny that the underlying religious claim imposes on other claims.

The Court should mend the inexplicable gap between religious use and status that in practice creates the wedge between children and the education they have a right to access on equal terms.

¹⁶ Of course, here, it is not the child who bears the stigma, but the school, leaving no recourse for the child whose only personal claim is lost opportunity.

CONCLUSION

The Court should grant the Petition.

Respectfully submitted,

CYNTHIA FLEMING CRAWFORD

Counsel of Record

CASEY MATTOX

AMERICANS FOR PROSPERITY

FOUNDATION

1310 N. Courthouse Road, Ste. 700

Arlington, VA 22201

(571) 329-2227

ccrawford@afphq.org

Counsel for Amicus Curiae

March 9, 2021